Germany Factsheet

49% of German compliance heads say compliance standards vary widely across different countries or locations.

German respondents are more confident than their international peers about managing risk while remaining compliant, but there is still much work to be done: 47% say the volume of new regulation has made the task incredibly difficult.

German respondents take greater ownership of compliance than respondents elsewhere though more than half continue to shy away from the responsibility: 52% say compliance is solely the duty of the compliance team.

German companies have acquired or made investments in companies with significant compliance issues that were:

69% of German compliance leaders feel stretched by their company’s attempts to expand into new markets and adopt new business models.

German respondents are more confident than their international peers about managing risk while remaining compliant, but there is still much work to be done: 47% say the volume of new regulation has made the task incredibly difficult.

German respondents take greater ownership of compliance than respondents elsewhere though more than half continue to shy away from the responsibility: 52% say compliance is solely the duty of the compliance team.

German companies have acquired or made investments in companies with significant compliance issues that were:

69% of German compliance leaders feel stretched by their company’s attempts to expand into new markets and adopt new business models.