

When working remotely from a jurisdiction other than where the employing entity is a tax resident, and where (at least one of) the following conditions are present, ...

- If a director/ executive takes key management decisions
- If an employee is habitually involved in contract conclusion/ negotiation activities on behalf of the employing entity
- If an employee is required to work remotely (its employer does not provide an office but instead IT equipment such as printers, screens, etc. to work from home)
- And in any case, if an employee works regularly from the same country which is not their habitual place of work

...this could result in the following tax consequences for the employer...

- Effective place of management
This may impact the tax residence of the employer and result in double residency and/ or exit taxation.
- Transfer pricing
Depending on the functions concerned, this may lead to the allocation of taxable profits to the host country/ denial of losses (if any) in the home country by the respective tax administrations
- Permanent establishment exposure
As a result, the foreign employing entity may be regarded as taxable by the tax administration of the host country.
- Wage tax withholding obligation
Employer might become subject to wage tax withholding obligation even if there is no permanent establishment in the host country.
- Social security withholding obligation
Employer might be obliged to withhold social security obligations in the host country.

...and for the employee.

- Tax residency
- Income taxation
- Wealth, inheritance and gift taxation

How to manage the risks and how we can provide support:

Monitor employees' remote place of work

Assess the tax and other legal risks in the respective jurisdictions

Design a remote working policy

Keep your employees informed about the possible tax and legal consequences / Providing training

Register with the relevant tax and social security authorities, if necessary

Establish a NewCo or a branch in the host country, if necessary
